

Film, Television and Video productions featuring brass bands

Gavin Holman, October 2019

Over the years the brass bands in the UK, and elsewhere, have appeared numerous times on screen, whether in feature films or on television programmes. In most cases they are small appearances fulfilling the role of a “local” band in the background or supporting a musical event in the plot of the drama. At other times band have a more central role in the production, featuring in a documentary or being a major part of the activity (e.g. Brassed Off, or the few situation comedies with bands as their main topic). Bands have been used to provide music in various long-running television programmes, an example is the 40 or more appearances of Chalk Farm Salvation Army Band on the Christmas Blue Peter shows on BBC1. Bands have taken part in game shows, provided the backdrop for and focus of various commercial advertisements, played bands of the past in historical dramas, and more.

This listing of 450 entries is a second attempt to document these appearances on the large and small screen – an original list had been part of the original Brass Band Bibliography in the IBEW, but was dropped in the early 2000s. Some overseas bands are included.

Where the details of the broadcast can be determined (or remembered) these have been listed, but in some cases all that is known is that a particular band appeared on a certain show at some point in time - a little vague to say the least, but I hope that we can add detail in future as more information comes to light.

I have excluded private and commercial broadcast video recordings of concerts, contests and other musical events. Both BBC and ITV produced several series over the years of bands contesting (e.g. Granada TV's Band of the Year or BBC2's Best of Brass, BBC1 Northwest's Champion Brass).

I have ignored those television programmes and films where bands provided soundtrack accompaniments or the theme tune (e.g. Consett Steel Works Band playing the theme tune of Granada TV series The Stars Look Down [1975], or Black Dyke Band playing the BBC1 Ground Force theme [1997-2005] – although they did actually appear in one episode) – another research opportunity for the future?

I have also left out the many theatre performances of “Brassed Off” which have taken place – my own band, Harrogate, has performed in two of these alone. These omissions can perhaps be the subject of a future research exercise.

I have included a few radio documentaries I have identified but excluded all other radio programmes which featured brass bands (e.g. Listen to the Band, Sounds of Brass, etc.), broadcast concerts and individual performances. Again, looking into the wealth of radio performances by brass bands is another future piece of work.

Many vintage recordings of bands in concert or contesting exist in news reels, and news reports of the past. Some of these are available from Youtube, the British Film Institute, British Pathé and other media archives. Some bands also have small archives of video recordings of performances on their websites.

The earliest known appearance of a brass band on screen (apart from straight recordings of concerts or musical pieces) is that of Luton Red Cross Band which featured in Up for the Cup, a film released in 1931, starring Sydney Howard, Joan Wyndham, Stanley Kirk and Moore Marriott. It is a comedy about a Yorkshireman who comes to London to watch the FA Cup final and loses his money and tickets, leading to a frantic search to recover them.

Up for the Cup (1931)

Sing as we Go - Gracie Fields - 1934

Following that we have Sing As We Go - a film from 1934 - when the textile mill closes, putting her out of work, Gracie Fields finds herself experiencing all of the amusements of Blackpool. It featured the Besses o' th' Barn Band in a scene filmed at Denvale Mill on Tongue Moor Road, Bolton marching with Gracie and the mill girls, singing "Sing as we Go".

The next one is Play Up The Band - a film from 1935 - a musical comedy film starring Stanley Holloway, made at Ealing Studios. Location shooting took place at the Crystal Palace, which burnt down the following year. The brass band of the Northern town of Hechdyke travel south to London to compete in a national contest. The featured brass band is unknown.
